

Life Without Money

What is money? Most of us would define it in terms of being a medium of exchange, giving one thing in return for something else. The exchange in this context would entail the possession of something that is considered to have value. We work, thus we are rendering a service. In exchange for that service, we then receive an item(s) that we think is valuable. We keep that item until the time comes when we exchange it for something that we want or need. This object—or objects—is what we use in our daily lives in order to survive, live, and thrive.

With that said, we can safely assume that money is a means to achieve an end. It can be used for good will, and it can also be used for ill will. The point being is that money is an evanescent object. It disappears, and more often than not, quickly.

If we think of money as energy—a flow and the exchange thereof—would it be possible to live without it? Yes, but first let us consider why the question is being brought to attention.

To reiterate, money is a two-edged sword that can be used for good will or ill will depending on the intention of the individual who wields it. In today's society, far too many people suffer from abuse, starvation, homelessness, etc., in large part due to this particular medium of exchange. Why is that? While every individual's path cannot be accounted for here, it can be said that the quickly-disappearing "valuable item" is used to obtain something that is wanted and/or needed. The effects of the usage of money outlast the existence of the item itself.

Let us now go back to the question of the possibility of living without money. Yes, mankind can definitely live without money. If we view money as merely an exchange of energy—which, really, it is when you think about it from a bigger perspective—there really would be no need to have those dollars (or euros, rubles, dong, or whatever currency you use) in your wallet. After all, the money would not last nearly as long as that which one seeks to procure with it. Wouldn't it be better, then, to have a more meaningful exchange of energy, something that would have a more lasting and positive impact?

Take a bartering system, for example. Civilizations in the past have used a system of exchange wherein one tribe would trade goods that were thought to be of good value (clothing, livestock, food, etc.) with another tribe that lived nearby. A coastal Oregon tribe such as the Chinook, having items that are specific to that region, would trade seashells and baskets made of woven cedar bark with inhabitants of the tribes that lived inland (such as the Bannock). The Bannock would then be able to supply bison hides and obsidian for arrowheads.

Thus we have a system of trade containing items that are deemed valuable—all without using money. Here, money is not necessary for the simple fact that the end goals are achieved using items of value.

What role would money have played in a transaction between the Chinook and the Bannock? Let us speculate. A few people from the Chinook travel inland to acquire bison hides from the Bannock for the upcoming winter season. Having gold coins in their possession, the Chinook purchase the bison hides from the Bannock. The Chinook head back home with items of value, while the Bannock now have gold in their possession. What would they do with the gold? Where is the value in it? They couldn't eat the coins, nor would the coins keep them warm during the winter. They may be able to use them for decoration, or they could purchase seashells from the Chinook; and in that event, the same gold coins would go right back from whence they came. Money would therefore exist merely to be passed from hand to hand, being a means to achieve an end.

If we were to take money out of the equation and go back to the barter system, items of real, practical value would be used in the transaction. Seashells, beads, etc. would be traded for bison hides and arrowheads. Both tribes would be able to pragmatically use the items in the transaction, as they were deemed to have value. Bartering would thus have a more lasting impact on civilization.

Bartering, however, is not the only means by which society can live without money. To embrace a new idea is to consider a paradigm shift. We would have to be willing to accept that there are other ways to live without money.

Enter a new mode of thinking, and by extension, living. What if we lived in a world where everyone was able to live their lives doing what they love to do? What if there was no more war, no more homelessness, no more sickness, and everyone was happy?

Such a world can indeed exist. In other parts of the Universe, there likely already are worlds like that. One might ask, “How could such a place exist?” To answer that, we must consider the concept of higher-dimensional existence. Currently, there is so much pain and suffering on planet Earth because not everyone is free; and by that I mean not everybody realizes their potential as a sovereign being, free to make their own choices. Being at the level of awareness that enables them to know they are the creators of their lives plays a huge role here. Of course, some people are tricked into slavery by various means. In my humble opinion it would take divine intervention to set them free.

So let us expound on higher-dimensional existence. If the human species here on Earth realized that we don’t need war, hate, deceit, or any other form of negativity, life would be so much different than what we are currently experiencing. Would we not, then, be more inclined to help one another? If we lived our lives out of love and in service to one another, what need would we have of a temporary means to achieve an end such as money? We would be better off without it!

Now here is where it will really help to think outside the box, to dream big and then dream bigger. What if there were beings from advanced civilizations that were ready and waiting to help the humans on Earth evolve to greater heights (not just advanced beings, but angels and ascended masters as well)? Advanced technology would surely make our lives easier, and even increase our lifespan. The genius inventions of Nikola Tesla would surely benefit mankind, and if it were not for beings with ill will in their hearts, we would not have to pay for electricity. Things like celestial chambers and replicators would also completely change the way we live.

With a celestial chamber—or med bed—there would be no need for hospitals other than for women to give birth, perhaps. Sickness would be a thing of the past, for this kind of technology would rid the body of anything that is unnatural or destructive and restore it to its optimum state.

In order to move forward and progress in life, it is vital to break the bonds of slavery (in whatever form that may be). Once free, we can grow. Money is one of the easiest ways by which to entrap an individual. Remove money from the planet, and we would achieve a level of freedom hitherto unthinkable—aside from each individual needing to break any mental, physical or spiritual chains that are binding them.

One way we would live without money would be with the use of replicators, which are devices that can copy and reproduce anything from clothes and toys to houses. It would take some time for mankind as a collective to get used to these technologies and to live without money, but it can be done; and oh, what a glorious time it will be when we as a whole are free of those bonds!

It is the ultimate goal of World Benevolence Group to rid planet Earth of money. As we evolve to higher states of being, we will see that there is no need for that temporary means to achieve an end. Together, we can make life great again. Welcome to the new Earth; welcome to World Benevolence Group!
